Remarks at Bob Batscha Memorial Service
August 20, 2003
Henry A. Kissinger

Our lives are finite, but our dreams are not. This is why every great achievement was somebody’s dream before it became a reality. It is the way we compensate for the transitoriness of our existence and leave behind a memory and a testimonial.

Bob Batscha was a visionary. Dedicated, thoughtful, he pursued his vocation, which was at the same time his hobby, with a combination of passion, intelligence, and understated elegance. Many contributed, but it was Bob who was the impetus and inspiration behind the Museum of Television and Radio. As a friend of Bill Paley, I had some idea of what he as the Museum’s founder had in mind. But Bob’s achievement exceeded even Paley’s expectations – not an easy goal to accomplish. With his charm keeping his persistence from turning into relentlessness, Bob expanded the Museum’s library of television programs from 5,000 to over 120,000. And his imagination made this repository of the new medium come to life with seminars, festivals, and educational programs, including the University Satellite Seminar series. With headquarters in both New York and Los Angeles, the Museum will, as time goes on, become central not only as a record of the past – though it will be indispensable for that – but above all as a focal point for the transition of human consciousness from knowledge based on words to knowledge based on pictures.

I worked most closely with Bob on his efforts to expand the Museum’s reach beyond the United States. His vehicle was the International Council, a group of leading media executives and creative men and women from around the world that assembles once a year, each time in a different country. Meetings have been held in Rome, Bonn/Berlin, London, Madrid, Vienna, Paris, and last year in China. I have had the honor of serving together with Frank Bennack as co-chair of the group. But since I needed Bob’s help in finding my way through such terms as "broadband" and "digital divide," it is clear who was responsible for the International Council’s success. Participation has exploded with each year, both in numbers and stature of the participants, as the Museum triumphantly reached around the world. Bob Batscha made the sessions interesting and relevant, wisely confining my penchant for foreign policy discussions to manageable proportions – that is to say, over a single lunch.

In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob – a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner – had scheduled only a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home. But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob’s carefully arranged travel schedules and evoking in him a combination of elation tinged with frenzy over the disintegration of his travel schedules.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by me to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would – if even possible at all – be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed on for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing – in their original languages – “O Sole Mio” and “Our Hearts Were Young,” even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs. The musical interlude – not to speak of Jiang’s attendance in the first place – disrupted Bob’s schedule, which, as always, was timed like clockwork. But since no travel schedules were affected, he was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.

I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties, which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob’s devotion to his son and the pride he took in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitude as if every minute counted. And now we understand, of course – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.
Those whose lives were touched by Bob Batscha will never forget him, and those who did not have that privilege will find in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, thrusting, and warm-hearted visionary.
Remarks at Bob Batscha Memorial Service
August 20, 2003
Henry A. Kissinger

Our lives are finite, but our dreams are not.

This is why every great achievement was somebody’s dream before it became a reality. It is the way we compensate for the transitoriness of our existence and leave behind a memory and a testimonial.

Bob Batscha was a visionary. Dedicated, thoughtful, he pursued his vocation, which was at the same time his hobby, with a combination of passion, intelligence, and understated elegance.

Many contributed, but it was Bob who was the impetus and inspiration behind the Museum of Television and Radio. As a friend of Bill Paley, I had some idea of what he as the Museum’s founder had in mind. But Bob’s achievement exceeded even Paley’s expectations — not an easy goal to accomplish. With his charm keeping his persistence from turning into relentlessness, Bob expanded the Museum’s library of television programs from 5,000 to over 120,000. And his imagination made this repository of the new medium come to life with seminars, festivals, and educational programs, including the University Satellite Seminar series.

With headquarters in both New York and Los Angeles, the Museum will, as time goes on, become central not only as a record of the past – though it will be indispensable for that – but above all as a focal point for the transition of human consciousness.
from knowledge based on words to knowledge based on pictures.

I worked most closely with Bob on his efforts to expand the Museum’s reach beyond the United States. His vehicle was the International Council, a group of leading media executives and creative men and women from around the world that assembles once a year, each time in a different country.

Meetings have been held in Rome, Bonn/Berlin, London, Madrid, Vienna, Paris, and last year in China. I have had the honor of serving together with Frank Bennack as co-chair of the group. But since I needed Bob’s help in finding my way through such terms as “broadband” and “digital divide,” it is clear who was responsible for the International Council’s success. Participation has exploded with each year, both in numbers and stature of the participants, as the Museum triumphantly reached around the world.

Bob Batscha made the sessions interesting and relevant, wisely confining my penchant for foreign policy discussions to manageable proportions – that is to say, over a single lunch.

In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob – a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner – had scheduled only a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home. But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob’s carefully arranged travel schedules and evoking in him a combination of elation tinged with frenzy.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by me to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would – if even possible at all – be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed on for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing – in their original languages – “O Sole Mio” and “Our Hearts Were Young,” even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs. The musical interlude – not to speak of Jiang’s attendance in the first place – disrupted Bob’s schedule, which, as always, was timed like clockwork. But since no travel schedules were affected, he was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.

I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties, which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob’s devotion to his son and the pride he took in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitude as if every minute counted. And now we understand, of course – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.
Those whose lives were touched by Bob Batscha will never forget him, and those who did not will find in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, thrusting, and warm-hearted visionary.
Remarks at Bob Batscha Memorial Service
August 20, 2003
Henry A. Kissinger

Our lives are finite, but our dreams are not. This is why every great achievement was somebody’s dream before it became a reality.

It is the way we compensate for the transitoriness of our existence and leave behind a memory and a testimonial.

Bob Batscha was a visionary. Dedicated, thoughtful, he pursued his vocation, which was at the same time his hobby, with a combination of passion, intelligence, and understated elegance. Many contributed, but it was Bob who was the impetus and inspiration behind the Museum of Television and Radio. As a friend of Bill Paley, I had some idea of what he as the Museum’s founder had in mind. But Bob’s achievement exceeded even Paley’s expectations – not an easy goal to accomplish. With his charm keeping his persistence from turning into relentlessness, Bob expanded the Museum’s library of television programs from 5,000 to over 120,000. And his imagination made this repository of the new medium come to life with seminars, festivals, and educational programs, including the University Satellite Seminar series. With headquarters in both New York and Los Angeles, the Museum will, as time goes on, become central not only as a record of the past – though it will be indispensable for that – but above all as a focal point for the transition of human consciousness from knowledge based on words to knowledge based on pictures.

I worked most closely with Bob on his efforts to expand the Museum’s reach beyond the United States. His vehicle was the International Council, a group of leading media executives and creative men and women from around the world that assembles once a year, each time in a different country. Meetings have been held in Rome, have had the honor of serving together with Frank Bennack as co-chair of the group. But since I needed Bob’s help in finding my way through such terms as “broadband” and “digital divide,” it is clear who was responsible for the International Council’s success. Participation has exploded with each year, both in numbers and stature of the participants, as the Museum triumphantly reached around the world.
Bob Batscha made the sessions interesting and relevant, wisely confining my penchant for foreign policy discussions to manageable proportions – that is to say, over a single lunch.
In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob – a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner – had scheduled only a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home. But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob’s carefully arranged travel schedules and evoking in him a combination of elation tinged with frenzy.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by me to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would – if even possible at all – be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed on for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing – in their original languages – “O Sole Mio” and “Our Hearts Were Young,” even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs. The musical interlude – not to speak of Jiang’s attendance in the first place – disrupted Bob’s schedule, which, as always, was timed like clockwork. But since no travel schedules were affected, he was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.

I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties, which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob’s devotion to his son and the pride he took in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitude as if every minute counted. And now we understand, of course – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.
Those whose lives were touched by Bob Batscha will never forget him, and those who did not will find in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, thrusting, and warm-hearted visionary.
Remarks at Bob Batscha Memorial

Our lives may be finite, but our dreams are not. And every great achievement was somebody’s dream before it became a reality.

It is the way we compensate for the transitoriness of our existence and leave behind a memory and a testimonial.

Bob Batscha was a dreamer, observing the dedicated, thoughtful way he pursued his hobby, which was at the same time his vocation. Bob’s combination of passion and understated elegance, was the impetus behind the Museum of Television and Radio. As a friend of Bill Paley, the Museum’s founder, I had some idea of what Bill had in mind. But Bob’s achievement exceeded even Paley’s expectations.
- not an easy goal to accomplish. His charm keeping his persistence from turning into relentlessness, Bob expanded the Museum’s library of television programs from 5,000 to over 120,000. And his imagination made this repository of the new medium come to life with seminars, festivals, and educational programs, including the University Satellite Seminar series. With headquarters in both New York and Los Angeles, the Museum evolved as a unique research and development center for the field. Through it all, I worked most closely with Bob on his efforts to expand the Museum’s reach beyond the US. His vehicle was the creation of the International Council, a group of leading media executives and creative people from around the world that meets once a year, each time in a different country. Meetings have been held in Rome, Bonn/Berlin, London, Madrid, Vienna, Paris, and last year in China. I have had the honor of serving as co-chairman of the group. But since I needed Bob’s help in finding my way through such terms as "broadband" and "digital divide," it is clear who was responsible for the International Council’s success. Participation has grown with each year, both in numbers and stature of the participants, and the reach of the Museum triumphantly expanded around the world because Bob Batscha made the sessions interesting and relevant, wisely confining my penchant for foreign policy discussions to manageable proportions – that is to say, over a lunch. In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob – a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner – had scheduled only a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home.
But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob's carefully arranged travel schedules and inducing frantic concern [but at the same time] elation in him.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by his foreign policy expert to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed only for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing — in their original languages — "O Sole Mio" and "Our Hearts Were Young," even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs.

The evening was supposed to run like clockwork, only to be disrupted by the musical interlude — not to speak of Jiang's attendance [disrupted Bob's schedule] which as always was [in the first place]. But since no travel schedules were affected, Bob was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.
I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob’s devotion to his son and pride in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitude as if every minute counted. And now we know, of course – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.

Those who knew Bob Batscha will never forget him, and those who did not will see in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, trusting, warm-hearted visionary.
Remarks at Bob Batscha Memorial Service
August 20, 2003
Henry A. Kissinger

Our lives are finite, but our dreams are not. This is why every great achievement was somebody’s dream before it became a reality. It is the way we compensate for the transitoriness of our existence and leave behind a memory and a testimonial.

Bob Batscha was a visionary. Dedicated, thoughtful, he pursued his vocation, which was at the same time his hobby, with a combination of passion, intelligence, and understated elegance. Many contributed, but it was Bob who was the impetus and inspiration behind the Museum of Television and Radio. As a friend of Bill Paley, I had some idea of what he as the Museum’s founder had in mind. But Bob’s achievement exceeded even Paley’s expectations - not an easy goal to accomplish. With his charm keeping his persistence from turning into relentlessness, Bob expanded the Museum’s library of television programs from 5,000 to over 120,000. And his imagination made this repository of the new medium come to life with seminars, festivals, and educational programs, including the University Satellite Seminar series. With headquarters in both New York and Los Angeles, the Museum will, as time goes on, become central not only as a record of the past – though it will be indispensable for that – but above all as a focal point for the transition of human consciousness from knowledge based on words to knowledge based on pictures.

I worked most closely with Bob on his efforts to expand the Museum’s reach beyond the United States. His vehicle was the International Council, a group of leading media executives and creative men and women from around the world that assembles once a year, each time in a different country. Meetings have been held in Rome, Bonn/Berlin, London, Madrid, Vienna, Paris, and last year in China. I have had the honor of serving together with Frank Bennack as co-chair of the group. But since I needed Bob’s help in finding my way through such terms as "broadband" and "digital divide," it is clear who was responsible for the International Council's success. Participation has exploded with each year, both in numbers and stature of the participants, as the Museum triumphantly reached around the world. Bob Batscha made the sessions interesting and relevant, wisely confining my penchant for foreign policy discussions to manageable proportions – that is to say, over a single lunch.

In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob – a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner – had scheduled only a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home. But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob's carefully arranged travel schedules and evoking in him a combination of elation tinged with frenzy over the disintegration of his travel schedules.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by me to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would – if even possible at all – be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed on for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing – in their original languages – "O Sole Mio" and "Our Hearts Were Young," even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs. The musical interlude – not to speak of Jiang's attendance in the first place – disrupted Bob's schedule, which, as always, was timed like clockwork. But since no travel schedules were affected, he was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.

I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties, which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob's devotion to his son and the pride he took in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitude as if every minute counted. And now we understand, of course – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.
Those whose lives were touched by Bob Batscha will never forget him, and those who did not have that privilege will find in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, thrusting, and warm-hearted visionary.
In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob — a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner — had scheduled only a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home.

But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob's carefully arranged travel schedules.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by me to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would — if even possible at all — be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed on for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing — in their original languages — "O Sole Mio" and "Our Hearts Were Young," even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs. The musical interlude – not to speak of Jiang’s attendance in the first place – disrupted Bob’s schedule, which, as always, was timed like clockwork. But since no travel schedules were affected, he was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.

I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties, which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob’s devotion to his son and the pride he took in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitude as if every minute counted. And now we understand, of course – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.
Those whose lives were touched by Bob Batscha will never forget him. And those who did not will find in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, thrusting, and warm-hearted visionary.
Remarks at Bob Batscha Memorial

Our lives may be finite, but our dreams are not. Every great achievement was somebody's dream before it became a reality.

It is the way we compensate for the transitoriness of our existence and leave behind a memory and a testimonial.

Bob Batscha was a dreamer. Observing the dedicated, thoughtful way he pursued his hobby, which was at the same time his vocation, Bob's combination of passion and understated elegance was the impetus behind the Museum of Television and Radio. As a friend of Bill Paley, the Museum's founder, I had some idea of what Bill had in mind. But Bob's achievement exceeded even Paley's expectations.
- not an easy goal to accomplish. His charm keeping his persistence from turning into relentlessness, Bob expanded the Museum's library of television programs from 5,000 to over 120,000. And his imagination made this repository of the new medium come to life with seminars, festivals, and educational programs, including the University Satellite Seminar series. With leadership in both New York and Los Angeles, the Museum made its turn as an enormous cultural force and was recognized as a leader of the field through its programs.

I worked most closely with Bob on his efforts to expand the Museum’s reach beyond the US. His vehicle was the creation of the International Council, a group of leading media executives and creative personnel from around the world that meets once a year, each time in a different country. Meetings have been held in Rome, Bonn/Berlin, London, Madrid, Vienna, Paris, and last year in China. I [have] had the honor of serving as co-chairman of the group. But since I needed Bob's help in finding my way through such terms as "broadband" and "digital divide," it is clear who was responsible for the International Council's success. [Meeting] attendance [has grown] with each year, both in numbers and stature of the participants, and the reach of the Museum triumphantly expanded around the world because Bob Batscha made the sessions interesting and relevant, [wisely] confining my penchant for foreign policy discussions to manageable proportions – that is to say, [over a lunch].

In fact, these meetings showed the limits of conventional foreign policy expertise. [For the Bonn gathering, I had arranged a meeting with then Chancellor Helmut Kohl. Guided by my advice, Bob

– a meticulous, if not obsessive, planner – had scheduled [only] a few minutes for that event, after which everyone was to leave for home.

But the Chancellor was so taken with the group that he stayed for two hours, wreaking havoc with Bob’s carefully arranged travel schedules and inducing frantic concern [but at the same time] elation in him.

Similarly, in China, Bob had been led by his foreign-policy experts to expect that a meeting with President Jiang Zemin would be formal, circumscribed, and official. As it turned out, Jiang stayed for dinner, capping the event by rising afterward and singing — in their original languages — “O Sole Mio” and “Our Hearts Were Young,” even making some members of his cabinet join him in the songs.

The evening was supposed to run like clockwork, only to be disrupted by the musical interlude — not to speak of Jiang’s attendance [disrupted Bob’s schedule, which as always was in the first place]. But since no travel schedules were affected, Bob was able to share the general sense of exuberance without restraint.
I admired Bob Batscha for what he achieved, and I treasured my relations with him for his human qualities, his warmth, his generosity, and his selflessness – all this reinforced by his exposing me occasionally to Viennese culinary specialties which we both loved.

Nancy and I were deeply moved by Bob’s devotion to his son and pride in his activities. His life revolved around Eric with a solicitous care as if every minute counted. And now we, of course, understand – though he never told us – that Bob knew that it did.

Those who knew Bob Batscha will never forget him, and those who did not will see in the Museum a memorial to a gentle, trusting, warm-hearted visionary.
Our lives are finite but our dreams are not. And every great achievement was somebody's dream before it became a reality. We are ungrateful for the achievements of our existence and leave behind a memory of testimonial.

Bob Batela was a dreamer. One only observing, dedicated, thoughtful, working so pruned his hobby until now at the same time he enriched his life with more and more, until he enriched his life with the occasion of the Museum of Broadcasting + Radio. A friend of Bill Haley led some idea of using the Museum's function? I lost the opportunity to

Bill in mind. But Bob's achievement

Kelley's expectations met an easy goal. With plans keeping his persistence accomplished, consistent, learning fueled from stumbling into brilliantness Bob Battle expanded the Museum's library of programs from 5 thousand to almost 120 thousand. Made them functional, this repository of the new machine came to life with numerous festivals, educational programs including the annuals, satellite seminars series.

One path coveit in many occasions, met back in Vienna where Bob lectured timers to serving less survey processes. He could just as well supportive me in all his之类 music ability. This happened during a meeting of the International Mathematic

I worked most closely with Bob Battle on his efforts. to expand the reach of the museum around the world. This vehicle was the creation of the International Committee, a group of leading museums, executives, and creative personnel from around the world. Once a year the group met in different countries, each time. We met in Rome, Bonn/Berlin, London, Madrid, Vienna, Paris, and last year in China. I lost the names of some of the members of the group, but I am sure that attendance fees with many year 74 in both numbers and stature of its participants and that thereby the reach of the museum was that about all of Bob Barile's tremendous expanded around the world because Bob Barile made the sessions interesting and relevant, inspiring my pendent for foreign policy discussions to manageable projects that is to say, a lunch.

In fact, these meetings, taken together, were the limits of unconventional foreign policy experience. Thus, in June, I had arranged a meeting with then-Chancellor Helmut Kohl, based on my advice that a meeting, if not obsessive, planners had scheduled a few minutes for that event after which everyone was to head for home. But the Chancellor was so taken with his guests that he stayed for two hours. Dismissing Bao's carefully arranged travel schedule, violating a combination of travel instructions and coordination in Bao, similarly in China, Bao had been led, by his foreign policy experts, to expect to meet with the President. Jiang Zemin would be formal, impersonal, and official. As it turned, and Jiang... only stayed for dinner and caught the event by rising afterwards and singing o solo trio + our hearts were sung in their original language - indeed made some members of his cabinet join him in the songs. The evening was supposed to seem like clockwork which was interrupted by the musical intervals - not to speak of joining's attendance. But since no travel schedule was involved, but could join to general sense of embroidery without restraint.

I admired Bok for what he achieved and dwelled many relations with him for his kindness, qualities, his manner, his generosity, his selflessness, all this reinforced by hisMiyagi, we occasionally to Vienna's culinary samples.
Nancy & I were deeply moved by Bob's life, dedicated around his devotion to his son and his pride in son's activities. He acted with solicitude for every minute counted.

And of course, we knew — though Bob never told us — that he knew that I did.

Those who knew Bob will never forget him, and those who did not will see in the museum a memorial to a gentle, thoughtful, warm-hearted visionary.